TELEGRAMS.

Strong indications of a general strike which is the fall shadow of the national crisis in Italy, we have, however, always looked upon the mere explosion of the Austrians as the beginning, not the end, of the work of emancipation. Not only was Rome not to be built in a day, but the mere digging of the foundations for the new city walls would take considerable time. The Italians are now fairly launched. All that material or moral aid from abroad will do for them has been done. The world does not yet fully realize their aspirations. Should that situation come to the anticipations of most men, it would not only bring pride to these latter, but it will be a clear positive gain for the whole world. On the other hand, should the experiment fail, and the forces of reaction be too strong, the progress would then be at a standstill.
